MISSION AND VISION

Vision Statement
SALC’s vision is that human rights and the rule of law are respected, protected, promoted and fulfilled throughout Southern Africa.

Mission Statement
SALC’s mission is to promote and advance human rights, democratic governance, rule of law and access to justice in Southern Africa through strategic litigation, advocacy and capacity strengthening.

Value Statement
• SALC believes in the promotion of democratic values, human dignity, substantive equality and non-discrimination.

• SALC focuses our work on communities who are marginalised and face challenges in accessing legal, social and environmental justice.

• SALC strives to foster an environment which respects the physical, mental and social well-being of our clients, partners and staff and encourages human flourishing.

• SALC strives to work in an inclusive, accountable, responsive, effective, consultative and empowering manner.
Across the continent, human rights’ defenders (HRDs) face mounting obstacles in carrying out their work. Human rights defenders in many African countries are subjected to unwarranted attacks and increased characterisation as threats to national security. The past two years have seen an increase in the use of criminal justice systems in an attempt to deter HRDs through prosecution on deceitful and fabricated charges as well as detentions without charges.

In November 2018, SALC convened a three-day summit in partnership with regional and international human rights’ organisations, under the theme ‘Reflecting on Closing Civic Spaces and its Impact on Marginalised Groups in Southern Africa’. The meeting brought together experienced human rights activists, key population experts and lawyers from across Southern Africa to ventilate all issues requiring strategic litigation and advocacy aimed at improving the environment for human rights defenders in the region. The purpose of the summit was also to unpack the use of criminal laws against civil society and NGO regulation, and devise strategies to counter shrinking civic spaces and improve regional responses to attacks on HRDs. The takeaway from the summit was that new and more effective strategies need to be developed to protect human rights’ defenders against the backdrop of increasing pushbacks and closing civic space. These strategies include fearless lobbying of parliamentarians and political parties to seek their support; increased collaboration by civil society organisations and ongoing recognition, support and solidarity for those who activists who face adversity as part of their efforts to champion human rights.

Also concerning is the increased use of internet shutdowns over election periods and to deter protests. Going forward this will require close monitoring, proactive mobilising and technical strategies in order to safeguard the rights of association and assembly.

The 2017 - 2019 period has seen many important victories for SALC’s thematic programme areas. Key cases traversing international criminal justice, women’s rights, LGBTI persons’ rights and the rule of law are set out in this report. Alarmingly, the context in which many human rights’ defenders are operating undermines human rights defenders’ ability to uphold basic human rights.

SALC CASES PER COUNTRY

AFRICA

EUROPE

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=H1Rc4IWPi-E
This case dates back to 2015 when SALC pursued an arrest warrant for former Sudanese President Omar Al-Bashir when he attended an African Union Summit in South Africa. His presence in the country triggered South Africa’s obligation under international law, as a party to the Rome Statute, and under domestic law, to arrest President Al-Bashir for transfer to The Hague to face prosecution. President Al-Bashir is wanted for war crimes, genocide, and crimes against humanity. Two international arrest warrants have been issued for President Al-Bashir by the International Criminal Court.

Despite the arrest warrants, Al-Bashir was not arrested on arrival in South Africa, resulting in SALC approaching the North Gauteng High Court on an urgent basis to seek his arrest. The High Court issued an interim order to ensure President Al-Bashir remained in the country pending the finalisation of the legal proceedings and later ordered that he be arrested with immediate effect. In contravention of the court order, the South African government allowed Al-Bashir to leave South Africa. The government then took the matter on appeal to the Supreme Court of Appeal (SCA). In March 2016, the SCA ruled that the State’s failure to arrest Al-Bashir was unlawful.

The SCA held that South Africa is bound by the Rome Statute as incorporated into domestic law by the passing of our Implementation Act and that all forms of immunity, including head of state immunity, would not be a bar to the prosecution of international crimes or a bar to the surrender of persons charged with such crimes. This, in the court’s view, was wholly consistent with South Africa’s commitment to human rights at a national and an international level.

In December 2016, the ICC took a decision to convene a public hearing under Article 87(7) of the Rome Statute to discuss issues relevant to its determination of whether to make a finding of non-compliance by South Africa. SALC was admitted as an amicus curiae to make submissions before the Chamber. The hearing took place on 7 April 2017. SALC’s submissions sought to demonstrate that South Africa had clear domestic and international legal obligations to arrest and surrender President Al-Bashir to the ICC. The Pre-Trial Chamber of the ICC ruled that South Africa had failed to comply with its international law obligations as stipulated by the Rome Statute. SALC was assisted by Advocates Max du Plessis, Isabel Goodman and Lerato Zikalala.

On 7 April 2017, the Southern Africa Litigation Centre appeared before the International Criminal Court (ICC) to argue that South Africa should be sanctioned for its failure to arrest President Omar Al-Bashir when he attended an African Union Summit in South Africa in June 2015.
This followed the November 2017 hearing in which the Constitutional Court deliberated on the issue of whether South African courts possess extra-territorial jurisdiction for crimes of terrorism and serious offences committed outside South Africa, and whether this was limited to prosecutions for the financing of terrorism only. Justice Edwin Cameron delivered the unanimous judgment, dismissing Mr Okah’s cross appeals.

Mr Okah is a Nigerian citizen holding South African permanent residence. He was charged with 13 counts under The Protection of Constitutional Democracy Against Terrorist and Related Activities Act 33 of 2004 (the Terrorism Act). The charges relate to two bombings in Nigeria which took place on 15 March 2010 in Warri and on the 1 October 2010 in Abuja. Both bombings were intended to inflict maximum carnage and resulted in the death of at least nine people.

Mr Okah was in Nigeria at the time of the Warri bombings and in South Africa during the Abuja bombings. The High Court convicted him on all 13 counts and sentenced him to 24 years in prison. The Supreme Court of Appeal (SCA) however held that South African courts have extra-territorial jurisdiction only in relation to “the crimes of financing the offence,” and overturned the Warri convictions and reduced the sentence to 20 years.

The Constitutional Court found that the narrow interpretation adopted by the SCA resulted in an absurdity where a court would have jurisdiction to “prosecute the banker, but not the bomber”. The court stated that “the general duty to combat terrorism is broad. It commands a reading of the Terrorism Act that enables South Africa to participate, as a member of the international community, in the fight against an international and transnational phenomenon. The conspicuous consequence of the contested interpretation is that it would pull the Terrorism Act’s teeth, rendering futile its expressed endeavour to give bite to this duty”. The undisputed facts before the trial court established that both the Warri and Abuja bombings were carried out in clear violation of international humanitarian law. Mr Okah intended for those bombings to be indiscriminate and deadly.

SALC was invited by the Court to make submissions and was admitted as amicus curiae. SALC’s submissions dealt with the interpretation of section 1 (4) of the Terrorism Act. SALC supported the State’s argument that the SCA erred in its narrow definition of “specified offence.” SALC submitted that a thorough reading of the entire Terrorism Act requires a broader meaning of the term “specified offence” which covers more than just the financing of terror offences.

The case is significant in confirming that South African courts possess extra-territorial jurisdiction in respect of terrorism offences committed outside the country. The Terrorism Act confers extra-territorial jurisdiction for courts to try crimes that occurred outside South Africa. The Constitutional court reinstated Mr Okah’s prison sentence of 24 years. SALC was represented in this matter by Advocate Kameel Premhid and Webber Wentzel Attorneys.

On 23 February 2018, the Constitutional Court handed down a unanimous judgment in the consolidated applications in the State v Okah matter confirming that South African courts possess extra-territorial jurisdiction in respect of terrorism offences committed outside the country.

QUOTE FROM THE JUDGMENT OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL COURT

The order of constitutional invalidity made by the High Court of South Africa, Gauteng Division, Pretoria on 1 March 2018 in case number 20382/2015 is confirmed in these terms:

1.1 The President’s participation in the decision-making process and his own decision to suspend the operations of the Southern African Development Community Tribunal is unconstitutional, unlawful and irrational.

1.2 The President’s signature of the 2014 Protocol on the Tribunal in the Southern African Development Community is unconstitutional, unlawful and irrational.

1.3 The President is directed to withdraw his signature from the 2014 Protocol.
On Friday 29 September 2017, the Lobatse High Court in Botswana handed down judgment in a case which challenged the refusal by the Registrar of National Registration to change the gender marker on the identity document of a transgender man.

The Applicant in this case is a transgender man. He was assigned a female sex at birth. In challenging the Registrar’s refusal to change his identity marker on his ID document, he presented psychological and medical evidence before the Court regarding his innate gender identity and the significant trauma caused by the State’s failure to formally recognise his gender identity. The Applicant submitted that his identity document should reflect his gender identity, which only became apparent after his birth. The Court held that the refusal to change the Applicant’s gender marker was unreasonable and violated his rights to dignity, privacy, freedom of expression, equal protection of the law, freedom from discrimination and freedom from inhumane and degrading treatment. The Court ordered the Respondent (the Registrar of National Registration) to change the gender marker on the Applicant’s identity document from ‘female’ to ‘male’ to protect his dignity and well-being. The Applicant was represented by Tshiamo Rantao and Lesego Nchunga and supported by the Southern Africa Litigation Centre.

These seminal cases demonstrate that courts in Botswana are champions of jurisprudence which acknowledges the rights of lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender persons and their right to equal protection before the law.
On 11 December 2018, the Constitutional Court confirmed the North Gauteng High Court ruling, that the former President’s actions in participating the in suspension of the SADC Tribunal in 2011 and signing the Protocol amending the Tribunal’s jurisdiction in 2014, were unlawful.

The SADC Tribunal was established by a treaty, the Protocol on the establishment of the SADC tribunal. When the protocol was adopted, it did not receive enough ratifications for it to enter into force. To solve this problem, the SADC heads of state and government, acting pursuant to its powers as a policy-making body of the organisation, decided to integrate the tribunal into the SADC Treaty as one of its organs by amending the SADC Treaty. This was done at Blantyre, Malawi on 14 August 2001. This amendment removed all obstacles still retaining the SADC tribunal as a regional tribunal. As such, the 2014 Protocol changed the original jurisdiction of the tribunal by taking away its mandate to hear cases filed by individuals against States and only allowing it to hear cases brought by SADC member states against each other, also called interstate disputes. The suspension of the tribunal in 2011 and the adoption of the new protocol in 2014, were subject of a legal suit before the High Court of Pretoria (North Gauteng Division), in South Africa on 5 February 2018. A vast majority of the SADC member states, including South Africa, ratified other SADC protocols that still retain the SADC tribunal as a body responsible for dispute resolution. Many of these protocols also grant jurisdiction to the SADC tribunal to hear cases filed by individuals. For example: the SADC protocol on Gender; the SADC protocol on Finance and the SADC protocol on Corruption and others. The foregoing protocols were all ratified by South Africa before 2014, when the decisions to suspend the tribunal and adopt a new protocol on the tribunal, respectively, were taken. This means that the rights of South African citizens to access the tribunal were already vested. The same applies to citizens in other SADC countries which ratified the above SADC treaties before 2014.

The High Court heard arguments about the former President’s conduct regarding the Tribunal in a case brought by the Law Society of South Africa (LSSA) and others against the President of South Africa, among others. The Southern Africa Litigation Centre and the Centre for Applied Studies were admitted to join the case as amicus curiae. The Applicants requested the Court to determine that the former President’s action in participating in the decision that led to the suspension of the SADC tribunal in 2011 were unconstitutional. The Court was also invited to determine that the President acted unconstitutionally when he signed the 2014 Protocol. SALC argued that South Africa’s parliamentary ratification of the SADC Treaty and the First Protocol created a right for individuals to access a regional tribunal. As such, the 2014 Protocol, which was adopted by the SADC Summit hinders this access. Consequently, the President’s actions fail to be declared invalid and unconstitutional. On 1 March 2018, the High Court declared the President’s actions in participating in the suspension of the Tribunal in 2011 and signing the 2014 Protocol unlawful. The decision was then referred to the Constitutional Court for confirmation.

SALC was admitted as amicus curiae before the Constitutional Court. At the hearing SALC made submissions pertaining to relevant international and regional law legal basis for citizens to access a regional tribunal. These arguments were made to support the point that the suspension of the SADC Tribunal by the SADC Summit violated the rights of South African citizens to access Justice before the Tribunal. SALC was represented by Advocates Jatheen Bhima and Thai Scott as well as Lawyers for Human Rights.

On 11 December 2018, the Constitutional Court handed down Judgment where it confirmed the order of constitutional invalidity made by the High Court under these terms:

- The President’s participation in the decision-making process and his own decision to suspend the operations of the Southern African Development Community Tribunal is unconstitutional, unlawful and irrational;
- The President’s signature of the 2014 Protocol is unconstitutional, unlawful and irrational; and
- The President is directed to withdraw his signature from the 2014 Protocol.
On 14 February 2018, the Lesotho High Court handed down a judgment in a landmark case on the rights of pregnant employees in the military: The case of Private Lekhetso Mokhele and Others v The Commander, Lesotho Defence Forces and Others.

In March 2016, the Commander of the Lesotho Defence Force (LDF) issued a Standing Order to the effect that any female soldier with less than 5 years’ service who became pregnant, wilfully or negligently, would be discharged from the force. The Applicants, two of whom were married, and one of whom subsequently had a miscarriage, became pregnant and were discharged from military service for willful disobedience of the Standing Order. They were discharged by the then Commander of the LDF, Lieutenant General Kamoli, without being subjected to a summary trial or court martial.

The Applicants challenged their discharge on the grounds that it was unlawful, unreasonable and irrational because the reasons given by the Commander for its existence and application were unacceptable and objectionable, as the Commander appeared to place the army command in loco parentis to the Applicants and considered the Applicants as persons that were too young to engage in sexual activity, yet at the same time trusting them to handle weapons. The Applicants also argued that the fact that the same army provides for maternity leave for pregnant women in the army who have been in service for 5 years or more shows a contradictory stance and such differentiation was not justifiable. A further argument was also made, that other countries like Malawi, Zambia and South Africa had put in place maternity policies in the army that were equitable. The Respondents argued that the Act, attracted a maximum penalty of imprisonment.

The Court further queried the basis for the Standing Order, enquiring whether pregnancy was an ailment and how it would make a soldier unable to carry out her duties, and, if that was the case, why the Commander did not proceed in terms of Section 24 of the Act which deals with the procedure where soldier is allegedly incapacitated.

The Court also observed that the Applicants were alleged to have breached a Standing Order, which was an offence itself, which, as provided for in the Act, attracted a maximum penalty of imprisonment. The Court rejected the Respondents’ contention that pregnant soldiers must be discharged because they compromise the army’s operational capacity and jeopardize military discipline.

The Court viewed this a throwback to the patriarchal view that pregnant women are not fit to work and, therefore, are a disposable workforce, which view the Court rejected in its entirety.

The Court further queried the basis for the Standing Order, enquiring whether pregnancy was an ailment and how it would make a soldier unable to carry out her duties, and, if that was the case, why the Commander did not proceed in terms of Section 24 of the Act which deals with the procedure where soldier is allegedly incapacitated.
The case began in March 2015 when a street vendor, the Applicant (Mr Mayeso Gwanda) in the case, was arrested by police while on his way to the market where he worked and charged with the offence of being a rogue and vagabond under Section 184(1)(c) of the Penal Code. The Penal Code provided that “every person in or upon or near any premises or in any road or highway or any place adjacent thereto or in any public place at such time and under such circumstances as to lead to the conclusion that such person is there for an illegal or disorderly purpose, is deemed a rogue and vagabond.” The offence of being a rogue and vagabond exists in the Penal Codes of many African countries and dates back to British colonial rule. The criminal case was stayed pending a constitutional petition in the Blantyre High Court challenging the constitutionality of the offence. The Applicant argued that section 184(1)(c) of the Penal code violates the right to dignity by being overbroad and giving law enforcement officers too much discretion, as well as negating the right to be presumed innocent. The Applicant submitted further that the enforcement of rogue and vagabond offences inevitably lead to arbitrary arrests given the wide powers of the police, which are influenced by police assumptions of criminality. These are often based on biases including those relating to poverty, gender, ethnicity and race. The Legal Aid Bureau, Centre for Human Rights Education, Advice and Assistance (CHREAA), Paralegal Advisory Services Institute (PASI) and Malawi Law Society were admitted as amicus curiae. On 1 September 2016, the Court heard arguments on preliminary procedural issues raised by the State. These were rejected by the Court on 4 October 2016.

Judgment was delivered on the merits on 10 January 2017 with the Court declaring the offence of being a rogue and vagabond unconstitutional. The main judgment was delivered by Justice Mtambo with concurring judgments by Justice Kalembera and Justice Ntaba. The Court found that the Applicant had made out a case that section 184(1)(c) of the Penal code violates, amongst other things, his dignity by being overbroad and giving law enforcement officers too much discretion, as well as negating the right to be presumed innocent. Much work was also done by SALC after the judgment was handed down to ensure its implementation, including meetings with police, training of magistrates, and drafting plain language materials on the judgment.

SALC Submission to the SAHRC on xenophobia:

In 2017, the Southern Africa Litigation Centre made a submission to the South African Human Rights Commission (SAHRC) on social cohesion and xenophobia in South Africa. This formed part of the SAHRC’s national hearing on xenophobia. In the submission, SALC called for the development of guidelines for xenophobia prevention, as well as the implementation of disciplinary measures against Department of Home Affairs officials who act contrary to the law.

Publication: an HIV Criminalisation Defence Case Compendium:

In countries all over the world, prosecutions of people living with HIV take place. These include prosecutions for the failure to disclose HIV status prior to sex (HIV non-disclosure). Prosecutions have also occurred for other acts such as breastfeeding. Convictions are common, including in cases where no intent to harm was established and no scientific evidence presented that transmission was possible or likely. The HIV Criminalisation Defence Case Compendium aims to support lawyers acting for those who are alleged to have put others at risk of HIV. It is based on research conducted in late 2017 and includes examples of criminal cases where strong defence arguments have resulted in acquittals or reduced penalties for persons living with HIV who have been accused of HIV exposure, non-disclosure or transmission.

Protection Frameworks for Refugees and Migrants in Southern Africa:

Refugees fleeing war or persecution are particularly vulnerable. If host countries do not offer protection, refugees may be condemned to an intolerable situation where their basic rights, physical security and lives are in jeopardy. SALC’s publication on Protection Frameworks for Refugees and Migrants in Southern Africa includes articles looking at South Africa’s asylum system, the arbitrary detention of migrants in Malawi as well as refugee protection in Uganda. It also considers the abuse of the refugee protection system.

Criminalisation of same-sex sexual acts in Botswana:

In May 2018, in commemoration of the International Day Against Homophobia, Transphobia and Biphobia, Lesbians, Gays and Bisexuals of Botswana (LEGABIBO), the Southern Africa Litigation Centre (SALC), the UNDP and Open Society Initiative of Southern Africa launched a booklet entitled: “The law needs to change, we want to be free” – The impact of laws criminalising same-sex relationships in Botswana. The booklet aims to identify the impact of criminalisation of same-sex sexual acts on the lives of LGBT persons in Botswana and make evidence-based recommendations for law review.

SALC submission on the Road Accident Fund Benefits Scheme Bill:

SALC objects to the exclusion of undocumented migrants from the benefits of the proposed Road Accident Fund Benefits Scheme Bill (the Bill). There are significant numbers of asylum seekers, refugees and migrants, both documented and undocumented, in South Africa. South Africa’s immigration laws do not provide mechanisms for low skilled migrants to be able to regularise their immigration status. This leaves many migrants, including SADC citizens, without the ability to obtain any kind of immigration status. SALC expressed its concern that there are sections in the Bill that prejudice undocumented migrants in that no provision is made for their care and treatment should they become injured in a motor vehicle accident.

SALC’s Report on The Alignment of Eswatini’s Domestic law with recommendations of human rights mechanisms

It is more than seventy years since the Universal Declaration of Human Rights was adopted but the struggle to achieve full realisation of human rights remains a pressing reality. SALC’s Report on The Alignment of Eswatini’s Domestic law with recommendations of human rights mechanisms assesses how domestic laws of the Kingdom of Eswatini align with recommendations issued by three UN human rights monitoring mechanisms: the Human Rights Council (UNHRC), the Human Rights Committee (HRC) and the Committee on the Elimination of Violence Against Women (CEDAW Committee).

SALC’s Report on the Closing of Civic Spaces:

SALC’s Closing Civic Spaces Report is a collection of articles from human rights practitioners, activists and human rights defenders operating in the Southern Africa region. The articles highlight contemporary issues of concern and paint the political and socio-economic context in which human rights defenders operate. The publication forms the background for a regional conference bearing the same title which took place in Johannesburg from 14 to 16 November 2018. The conference and publication came about through a collaborative effort between SALC, ARASA, the International Commission of Jurists, Media Legal Defence Initiative, the Southern Africa Human Rights Defenders Network and the Office of the High Commissioner of Human Rights.
